FOREWORD

The Directory of Churches and Religious Organizations in Maine presented herewith is a contribution of genuine worth which will receive thanks and praise both from historians and from that great group of people who are interested in the religious life of Maine. This is the first attempt of its kind in Maine and pioneering work is rarely as well done. The completeness of the lists testifies to a meticulous and persistent research and effort. A minimum amount of follow-up work will make the record permanently valuable and accurate as an up-to-date index.

The Introduction to the Directory deserves particular commendation. It should serve to enlighten many who are unaware of the unusual past in Maine's religious life, and it will help to explain many of the state's existing individualistic religious characteristics. It is hoped that ways will be found for making possible the expansion of this Introduction into well deserved book proportions. Many valuable leads are suggested for further historical research, and these should be followed through in order that the record of the strongest single force in Maine life - the pervasive strength of its religious institutions - may be complete.

"If an idea was born in Maine it travelled abroad" - thus comments the writer of the Introduction in describing the far reaching influence of Maine ideas and Maine people in religious and social advance. Let that word never be forgotten.

PREFACE

The Historical Records Survey was begun as a nation-wide undertaking of the Work Projects Administration in January, 1936, and it has been operating in Maine since March of the same year. The project is sponsored in Maine by the State Department of Education and it is under the administrative supervision of the WPA Division of Professional and Service Projects.

The principal objective of the Survey is to prepare inventories of the various kinds of historical records, both public and private, for the reference of lawyers, teachers, historians, students, and the general public. Because religious history has such significance, an important part of the project's program is taken up with the publication of inventories for the archives of churches and religious organizations.

Before undertaking the actual church archives inventory, it was evident that a list of active churches and religious organizations would first have to be compiled in order that there might be available a record which could be used as a guide to the work that must be done. This record has been prepared and is being published herewith as the Directory of Churches and Religious Organizations in Maine. The completion of this directory has been facilitated by the cooperation received from clerical leaders and other persons interested in a listing of this sort.

The Directory contains the names and addresses of over seventeen hundred churches and religious organizations located in the state. It thus manifests the extent of religious activity throughout the sparsely populated state of Maine, and by inference it indicates some of the factors in the growth of new sects, cults, and independent organizations. These points are brought out clearly in the introduction which begins on page 4. Consequently, the directory is not only a useful tool to be exploited by the project in the course of the preparation of church archives inventories but it is also a historical document which may be used as a basis for further study in religious history.

This Directory does not profess to be complete. However, one of the objectives in publishing the directory will have been achieved if the volume succeeds in eliciting additional information from the clergy and laity. In preparing this list a number of sources have been used. The official church year books, published by the larger denominations, were consulted first. Then in an attempt to discover the identity and locations of the many small churches and unusual sects, not mentioned in the available published sources, over 500 circular letters were sent out to the clergymen and town officials throughout the state. These two sources were supplemented by special correspondence and by conferences with church officials. In determining the status and affiliation of these churches, the compilers of the directory have accepted the claims of responsible church leaders. The list of pastors is correct on the whole as of July 1, 1940; pastorate changes made after that date will be included in a later edition of the Directory.

The project is grateful for the cooperation received from all the churchmen and laymen who have been of so much assistance in the preparation of this volume. Special acknowledgment must go to the following for their advice and

The Historical Records Survey was begun in a nation-wide survey of the Negro church in 1933, and it has been continuing in this line of work since that time. The project is sponsored in part by the State Department of Education and it is under the administrative control of the Division of Vocational and Technical Education.

The principal objective of the survey is to produce inventories of the various kinds of Negro church records, both public and private, for the purpose of preserving them, and the records of the Negro church are being collected in a systematic way. INTRODUCTION

INTRODUCTION

This volume represents the first attempt to bring together a current list of religious organizations and their leaders in Maine. It differs from the United States Census of Religious Bodies of 1926 and 1936 in that it is a directory and not a compilation of church statistics. It is unlike the very excellent Every Community (Church) Survey of Maine, made in 1930 under the direction of Rev. Basil Gleason of Brewer, sponsored by the National Home Mission Council and Interdenominational Commission of Maine, in that the compilers of the Directory have made no attempt to study the many social implications of the field surveyed in bringing together the data embraced in this volume.

Yet in compiling the Directory, a number of interesting trends in current church history have been brought to the attention of the compilers, and an opportunity would be lost were not these trends and the relationship they bear to the past be brought to the attention of those who may be interested in the religious history of Maine. In any field of human activity, no appreciation of the present can be achieved without a knowledge of the past. One could go even further and say that no program for the future can be really intelligent without an appreciation of what has been the past performance of those who would participate in that program. It is the purpose of this brief introduction to show how the present church situation in Maine is the result of the temper and social behavior of Maine people as developed in the past, forming now an important chapter in the cultural history of the state. Since space precludes a study which in length and substance would do justice to the subject, it is also the purpose of the introduction to set forth bibliographical suggestions for those who may be interested to study further into the subject.

Present day trends in Maine church history which stood out conspicuously as the Directory was in progress were (1) the growing inclination among the major Protestant denominations to coordinate their programs, (2) the large number of less orthodox Protestant groups which have grown up in the rural sections of the state, and (3) the tendency of church groups still to regard Maine as a mission field. Assuming that the consolidation of the major Protestant groups in small towns and rural areas is an admission that denominationalism at some time during the past ran rampant, it may be said that all the trends just noted are deeply rooted in that part of Maine history which belongs to her life as a frontier state; that all result, broadly, from an attitude of mind conditioned by certain conflicts growing out of Maine's economy; and that these conflicts have produced contradictions in Maine character difficult for anyone unfamiliar with Maine history to understand. It may be possible in this brief essay to show how these conflicts have arisen.

Despite the impressive list of churches and clergymen in Maine assembled between these covers, national church organizations and religious groups both in and out of the state look upon Maine even today as a home mission field. Yet the list of churches in Maine is long, and more than anything else, the writer would like to bring to life those religious worthies of the past who knew the Province of Maine in the seventeenth, eighteenth, and the early part of the nineteenth century, and who labored with discouragement among its people. Shown this Directory these clergymen might feel that their labor, done without remuneration and amid the greatest of hardships, had not been without results. For example, the founders of the Maine Missionary Society who organized in 1807 "to send the glorious gospel to those who are destitute of the public",¹ and saw fit for evident reasons to confine the spread of the gospel to the "public" in the District of Maine; and Rev. Mr. Jotham Sewall who tried manfully to lead the life of a dozen clergymen. Mr. Sewall's biographer compiled from his journals a list of places visited by him and the number of sermons preached during his active life.² Between 1785 and 1849, this indefatigable preacher of Chesterville delivered 12,593 sermons in 413 settlements, mostly in Maine. He left behind him seventy-one journals, without doubt the most voluminous extant collection of any one Maine preacher.

If Maine continues to be regarded as a mission field, the concern of organized religion, it is because a rural economy does not provide sufficient income for the people who live in rural sections to maintain a church and the services of a clergyman. Innumerable bays and inlets and many islands along a long coastline result in the isolation of her settlements, and in the north a broad, wooded terrain, thinly populated, tends to spread Maine's population of approximately eight hundred thousand inhabitants too thinly over the 31,500 square miles which comprise the state's actual area.

These things explain why the Roman Catholic Church supports missions and stations and why Protestant denominations and religious groups both in and out of the state regard Maine communities and the churches in them as the object of philanthropic interest. The same natural barriers which have isolated groups and made their religious life the problem of organized religion, have attracted the summer visitors in search of picturesque scenery and seclusion. It may be that the need in Maine has been exaggerated by these visitors who see only the small community of which they in the Summer are a part. Yet the financial assistance given these communities by such outstanding visitors as John D. Rockefeller, Jr., and the late Mrs. Edward Bok and Bishop Alexander MacKay-Smith, to say nothing of many others with names less widely known, has helped immeasurably in meeting the religious needs felt in small Maine communities.

The most conspicuous example of organized missionary effort at the present time devoted to the state and one group in it, grew quite definitely out of the effort of summer residents who frequent the sea-coast regions. The Maine Sea Coast Missionary Society was founded in 1905 to minister to the physical as well as the spiritual needs of hundreds of Maine fishermen and their families living in isolated and inaccessible settlements along the coast. Operating on a budget which is currently twenty-three thousand dollars, teeth, books, clubs, diet, and hospitalization, as well as religion, come within the scope of the society's benefactions to the people it so intelligently serves.

Introduction

A religious institution of a somewhat different nature, but one which also draws its inspiration from the coast and the summer visitors who have been attracted there, are the Protestant retreats on the Fisherman's Island estate of Rev. John Henry Wilson. Here in a spacious dwelling reminiscent of a medieval monastery, various groups of clergymen are brought together to discuss religious problems and commune with God and nature; the last suggestive, perhaps, that the cultivation of the spirit along the coast for our fishermen does not always depend on organized religion.

It seems needless to suggest that Maine's topography has remained unchanged since George Weymouth in 1605 sailed from the rugged and picturesque Monhegan island up the St. George river. Neither are the problems created by this topography new. From the time when the Jesuit missionaries accompanying Champlain on his historic voyage to eastern Maine disembarked to minister to the Indians, Maine, her aborigines, and her first vagrant settlers have been the problem of the church. For the first one hundred and fifty years of settlement in the Province of Maine, traders and fishermen who established homes along her shores were insufficiently nourished, clad, and sheltered. With hardly any concern for religion and little inclination to observe even the accepted moral code of England from which country they migrated, these early settlers were the scandal of Puritan Massachusetts and the concern of more respectable and Godly people who, after the Revolution, migrated north to the District of Maine. "Very few of the children born in that country are baptised", General Benjamin Lincoln wrote of the eastern provinces in 1790, "nor has the Lord's supper ever been administered in most of the towns and plantations below the Penobscot. There is a great reason to believe, that, unless some care is immediately taken to remedy the evil, by sending regular, ordained ministers into that country . . . the inhabitants will acquire, at least, an indifference to those important truths".¹

The eminent Maine historian, Charles Edward Banks, whose trustworthy scholarship is tempered somewhat with resentment toward Massachusetts, speaks about the "biased historians" of Puritan Massachusetts who have "conferred an odor of sanctity on Massachusetts, Connecticut and Plymouth, and a blanket of wickedness on Maine and New Hampshire".²

Introduction

The Puritan historians of Massachusetts¹ appear to have been very nearly right in their estimate of the moral and religious life in the Province of Maine. "Alas, Alas", wrote the Rev. John Murray of Boothbay, of his flock in 1763, "here I have had sad view of ignorance and carelessness in every house . . . inveterate habits of vice and no remorse. It gives me some comfort that I have found one prayerful family, and a humble professor at the head of it."²

Many are the references of a similar nature found in contemporary printed works and in the unpublished letters and diaries of itinerant missionaries and settled preachers in the District. The journals of Rev. Thomas Smith and his successor, Rev. Samuel Deane of the First Parish in Portland tell the same story, as do the journals kept by Rev. Jacob Bailey, the Church of England clergyman supported by Dr. Silvester Gardiner. In describing his life along the Kennebec, Bailey wrote that people were so poor and so indifferent to the church, that those whom he served would not contribute to his salary and gave him only negligible fees.³ This, too, in the picture of religious indifference and poverty given by John Josselyn⁴ in his An Account of Two Voyages to New England, London, 1675, in the seventeenth century, and by the frontier preachers and missionaries, Rev. Jotham Sewall, Rev. Paul Coffin, and Rev. Tristram Gilman in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries.⁵ All have left a record of a people destitute of material comforts, and impervious to the need of a moral code or spiritual nourishment. If Colonel Banks thought otherwise, it was because in York, about which he was writing, as in older towns, there were in the colonial period outstanding preachers, trained at Harvard and Yale. These in many cases were exemplary characters and able religious leaders. A petition from the "associated congregational ministers in ye County of Cumberland" to the General Court in 1738 began, "That : your petitioners, being mostly sons of Harvard . . .", the purpose of the petition being to "grant a Charter for a College in this County, to a corporation of fit persons to promote the interests of learning".¹

Introduction

Notorious exceptions to the "exemplary" characters were Rev. George Burdett² who preached in York in 1639 and 1640 until he was driven out by the infuriated authorities and the grasping German Lutheran preacher and doctor of Broad Bay, the Rev. Martin Schaeffer³ who baptized, buried, bled, physicked, and cheated his flock until he, too, was driven out of the community. General Lincoln, in his letter on the religious condition of the District just referred to, was as concerned over the type of itinerant preachers who found their way into Maine as he was over the absence of a settled ministry of accepted orthodox faith.

The impact of a newer group of self-reliant, post-Revolution settlers trained in the ways of the church, on the older group, produced a zeal for reform seen in all forms of Maine life in the succeeding century. It would not be stating the case too strongly to say that no trait of Maine character, flowing individually and collectively into Maine social institutions, affected Maine history more profoundly than this. It is to be found in the founding of local libraries and reading clubs, in the establishment of schools and churches, and in the missionary labors of itinerant preachers. Out of it grew a welter of reform societies such as the Young Men's Mutual Reform Society of Bangor, the Bangor Moral Society and Tythingmen, whose object was "to enforce the laws against vice and more particularly against profance swearing and Sabbath breaking",⁴ and the Society for the Suppression of Vice and Immorality, branches of which were in Bath and North Yarmouth. Its spirit is reflected in Lyceum programs, in all manner of benevolent societies in and out of the church, in the Sunday School movement, in Bible and Tract societies, in subscription lists to New England and Maine religious periodicals, and in self-improvement societies. The Maine Missionary Society, founded in 1807, was but one of its manifestations. In political history two great issues grew out of it, the antislavery and the prohibition movements, both of which made both the September and November elections in Maine unpredictable all during the nineteenth century.

Introduction

Nor was the zest for reform confined to the state, and the people and social institutions in it. A curious phenomenon was going on in Maine much akin to that in Massachusetts which has found its eloquent interpreter in Van Wyck Brooks. The result was a contradiction in Maine culture which lends color and interest to a study of Maine social life in the nineteenth century. For while Maine continued the social institutions of a frontier society and developed new settlements inland, an extraordinary maritime activity provided many contacts with the world beyond the Atlantic. Horizons were pushed back. An extensive and lucrative trade opened up new vistas of thought and furnished the impetus for greater creative activity. Increased wealth in seacoast towns made it possible to achieve a way of life in keeping with the new intellectual stimulation. Maine had her "flowering" in literature, painting, and music, but to the student of religious history, the globe trotting of Maine seamen in Maine ships made her people both strongly aware of the heathen in other lands and more liberal in her own thought.

This is the period when George Dana Boardman, Maine's first foreign missionary went to Burna, India; when Cyrus Hamlin founded Roberts College in Constantinople; and when Sybil Jones, the famous Quaker divine, pioneered in spreading the Christian conception of sex equality among the women of the Moslem world.¹ If an idea was born in Maine, it travelled abroad. Foreign missionary societies in towns along the coast sprung into existence to spread the gospel to foreign lands. Such societies appeared in Bath, Brunswick, Hallowell, Augusta, North Yarmouth, Saco, and Biddeford.² It was at this time that such national organizations as the American Colonization Society and the Society for Promoting Christianity among the Jews³ were established in Maine although there were at this time few Negroes and Jews in the state.

At the present time, when domestic problems overshadow all else in the state capital, it is hard to conceive how members of the legislature could become excited about the subject of "international literary exchanges" as expounded by a gentleman from another country, but in the middle of the nineteenth century considerable space in the legislative documents is assigned to the cultural efforts of one Mons.

Introduction

Alexander Vattemare of Paris, France, who wished to unite in a social and intellectual brotherhood all the nations of the earth.¹ His success in impressing the hard-shelled Yankees as we know them today is not so surprising when one recalls that it was in this period that William Ladd, a Maine man, organized the state and country for world peace and in 1842 brought forward his own historic plan entitled Essay on a Congress of Nations, London, Thomas Ward & Co., 1840.² It was also a period when Louis Kossuth, a Hungarian, described in the Maine Resolves as "a distinguished representative of freedom and constitutional liberty," could by legislative resolve be especially invited to the capital of the state and have his name adopted as a place name.³ The Greek Revolutions twenty years earlier were also a subject of interest, and in some towns societies were organized and meetings held to raise money to send to the victims of Turkish barbarism.⁴

It may be an assumption to say that all this had a liberlizing effect on the theology and social outlook of Maine people. Yet almost as soon as William Ellery Channing's famous sermon on Unitarianism was delivered in 1819, copies were advertised for sale in Bangor. Included in the list of goods advertised at the same time were: Holland gin, Jamaica, St. Croix, and Windward Island rum, Sketch of Missions to the Heathen, fish, coffee, sugar, Lisbon wine, and the Preacher's Manual.⁵

Even by this time a number of Maine men had embraced the doctrine of the unity. Foremost among these was George Thacher of Saco who in his earlier years at Harvard, had been so troubled with his religious thoughts as to write the great liberal, Benjamin Franklin, for advice. "And as to Jesus of Nazareth", wrote Franklin, "I think the system of morals and his religion as he left them to us, the best that the world ever saw, or is like to see. But I have with most of the dissenters in England, some doubts as to his divinity; though I see no harm in its being believed, if that belief has the good consequence as possibly it may of making his doctrines respected".⁶

Introduction

Both Unitarianism and Universalism were fairly widespread in Maine in the nineteenth century as many local town histories will testify. In Bangor was established one of the first Unitarian churches in the state and its preacher for fifteen years was none other than the transcendentalist, Frederic Hedge, who as a young man was sent abroad with the renowned George Francroft for study on the continent. Frederic Hedge, as Sylvester Judd, his Unitarian associate in the Augusta church, contributed to the literary as well as the religious history of the state. The Unitarian movement was "widely diffused all the way from the Piscataqua to the Penobscot", wrote Rev. A. D. Wheeler of Torsham, about 1850. Reporting to the National Unitarian Association in 1870, the secretary of the Maine Association was inclined to believe that the prevailing sentiment was not "such a sincere attachment to liberal faith" as it was a "dissatisfaction with orthodox preaching and the absence of any (preaching) that could satisfy the wants of intelligent people."¹

Dissatisfaction with the orthodoxy of Congregationalism had manifested itself a hundred years before this and denominational walls were already rolling in all directions. Calvinist doctrine in Puritan Massachusetts in that earlier period was reactionary and unbending. Coupled with the dissatisfaction of frontiersmen with so rigid a theology, was their disbelief in the prevailing idea of the upper classes that the government should be carried on by the rich and the good, the good being the Congregationalists, many of whom in eastern Massachusetts were also rich. These people fell into the ranks of the Federalist party and were a privileged class.

In Maine the people knew no class distinction. Everyone believed himself the equal of his neighbor. This concept of equality frontiersmen found in the faith preached by Baptist and Methodist itinerant ministers. The spread of the Baptist and Methodist churches in Maine from 1800 to 1830 coincided with the shift of the voters from the aristocratic Federalist party to the more homely ideas of equality set forth by Thomas Jefferson in the Democratic Republican party. The Federalists disliked democracy, and already the American and French Revolutions had given the people the vision of a larger life.² In Maine frontier life had exaggerated liberty of conscience and freedom of action. Personal evangelism fitted into this new pattern of extreme individualism.

Chapters in James Truslow Adams' New England in the Republic, 1776-1850, Boston, Little, Brown & Company, 1926, are excellent in showing how the conflict between the Federalists and the Democratic Republicans manifested itself in various fields of thought. However, as in so many books that deal with New England, there is little reference to Maine apart from Massachusetts.

Introduction

Thus the field was ready for the harvest. Itinerant Methodist preachers inspired by the evangelical success which accompanied George Whitefield's visits to America began to push into the District as early as 1793, holding services wherever a group could be accommodated. In Union it was "in the barn of Rufus Gilmore".¹ By 1796 a Beth circuit was formed extending as far east as Union. There were then 357 members of the church with six preachers regularly employed.² In 1807 the numerical strength of the church in the District had so far increased as to support twenty-five paid workers ministering to a membership of 2,562 people.³

By the time the Methodists had begun their inroads on orthodoxy in the District, the Baptists had already made definite gains. The doctrines of this church group had been introduced considerably earlier by Rev. William Scriven, a worthy exponent of the faith, who, after a mild persecution by the Puritans, had elected to remove with his followers to South Carolina. That was in 1682. In 1767 a Baptist clergyman living in Haverhill took part in the formation of a society of Baptists in South Berwick and by 1790 seventeen Baptist churches had been established in the District.⁴ In 1820 the number had increased to sixty.⁵

Town and church records tell the story of schisms and heated controversies over the benefits normally derived from ministerial and school lands. If the orthodox clergy publically prayed for the salvation of all souls, privately their opinions were candidly expressed. In his missionary journal, Rev. Paul Coffin observed that a sermon in Fairfield, 1798, "gave much satisfaction to his hearers except Mrs. Noble, a Baptist, who called it 'nothing but dish water'". And then he added, "It is the opinion among these Baptists that a man today may steal five hundred dollars, and to-night be converted . . . and tomorrow enjoy the cash. So is the doctrine of property found in grace, received in America."⁶

From the Baptists, the Free Will Baptists and the Free Baptists sprung. Yet this denomination and its offshoots, together with the Methodists, Congregationalists, Unitarians, and Universalists, were only a few of the denominations that grew out of the individualism,

Introduction

liberalism, and religious zeal of Maine people in two centuries. The emotionalism which produced the Free Will Baptists and the Methodists, and made them so "strenuous in support of their own peculiarities and often so irregular, tumultuous and noisy in their meetings",¹ also brought forth the Shakers, the Millerites, the Spiritualists, and at a later date the Sandfordites and the Holy Rollers. Many of the stronger denominations to-day were in the beginning composed of an under-privileged group in the community, just as some of the "odd sects" listed here in this Directory draw their adherents from those who suffer from our present maladjusted rural economy.²

Add to these groups the older religious organizations which pre-date the Revolutionary war; the Catholics, Quakers, Lutherans, Presbyterians, and the Episcopalians; the Swedenborgian church introduced in Bath in 1805, the origin of whose doctrine reflects somewhat the point made earlier in this essay that travel brought contact with new ideas,³ the "delusion" of Cochranism, a sect which grew up in 1816 around the charm of its founder and flourished in the western part of the state for several years until the handsome and winning Cochrane was charged with "gross lewdness and lascivious behavior", the Higgins-ites, the Palestine Emigration Association, the Free Thinkers, Jehovah's Witnesses, the Black Stocking group in Bar Harbor, and numerous minor sects listed in this Directory, and the picture is indeed one to provoke thought.⁴

Many sincere and emotionally balanced people comprised the church of the nineteenth century in Maine. Society, these people believed, was no better than the people who made it up, and while the emphasis of the Protestant church was on individual salvation through personal evangelism, society as well as the individual would be uplifted.

But the idea of Divine Revelation produced in some people a religious fanaticism. Dorothea Dix, in her famous Memorial to Congress in 1843 in which she pled for greater intelligence in the care of the incurably insane, gave religion as one cause for insanity, and then, as though fearful of being disloyal to her training, in a footnote carefully distinguished between true religion, "the basis for every virtue", and extravagant religious excitement.¹ She knew, for in Hampden, Maine, she had been brought up by a fanatically religious father. That negative aspect of her background, together with the wholesome, inspired years spent in the household of William Ellery Channing of Boston, made her one of the great reformers of the nineteenth century. Dorothea Dix in many ways exemplified the forces which were at work in Maine in the nineteenth century, not because her work was carried on in the state, for her theatre of activity was much larger, but because she was a product of the same attitudes which were at this time conditioning the behavior of Maine people.

This emphasis on personal evangelism developed in public meetings personal testimony which became a distinctive part of religious expression. This same technique was carried over into the field of temperance reform. In the diary of General Samuel Leighton of Alfred is an entry made in the spring of 1834, "Temperance meeting of a number of towns was at Sanford Thursday, they had quite a debate. Mr. Horace Allen got up and confessed his great fault at drinking; after he had done speaking Mr. Bacon said if the gentleman who had just spoken would pardon him he would just like to ask his audience to look at his face and see the bad effects of drinking".² A newspaper account of a temperance meeting in Stillwater stated the eighty-two people "came forward to take the pledge".³

A few years later General Leighton wrote, "There has been a great temperance reform in this place",⁴ which is much the same way that a religious revival was described by a Houlton woman in a letter to a friend. "The Freewill Baptists", she wrote, "are having quite a reformation here".⁵ However, all the people were not swept off their feet by this sort of thing. In Turner, a spiritual seance proved too much for Uncle Hervey who was forced to leave the room,⁶ and in Bucksport, the Millerites were driven out of town for refusing to harvest their crops, so convinced were they that the world was coming to an end.⁷ There was a morbid curiosity about new ideas in religion. General Leighton recorded that when in 1828 Elder Lewis, a Baptist, came to Alfred to preach in the court house a thousand people gathered at the river to see the immersion.⁸

Introduction

All this was characteristic of the times. The extreme individualism of Maine people and their passion for reform made them peculiarly susceptible to religious demagogues. Individualism also led to the great multiplication of churches throughout the state, the heritage of our church life today.

It may be natural that a state which has been plagued with denominationalism is the one in which there should be a conspicuous interdenominational movement. Fifty years ago such a movement was set actively in motion by William DeWitt Hyde, President of Bowdoin College, and Professor Alfred W. Anthony of Bates College. It was a part of a layman's movement to consolidate evangelical churches in the country and the progress it had made in Maine in 1891 was set forth by President Hyde in an article in the Review of Reviews.¹ From the Interdenominational Commission formed in Maine at this time has grown the Maine Council of Churches, an organization receiving at the present time the active cooperation of the Congregational-Christian Conference, the Friends, Methodist, Unitarian, and Universalist churches in Maine. The Maine Council is a member of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America and the International Council of Religious Education.

Important differences of doctrine are found in many of these religious groups. As President Hyde said in the article just cited, "one type of mind likes to give free vent to the rising tide of religious feeling in Amens and Hallelujahs. Another wants only the naked outline of truth from his minister". But denominations exist, too, because of the social and temperamental differences in people. When these differences can be broken down, there then exists among the Protestant sects a basis for a more even distribution of churches in the state, and an elimination of the waste which comes from an over-organized community.

The lists of Federal, Union, and Community churches in the Directory bear proof that there is in Maine a definite, practical trend toward interdenominationalism. The larger Parish movement, peculiar to Maine, seems even more enlightened in its application to a rural economy. Theological students from institutions outside of Maine have come into the state to study the larger Parishes at first hand. Maine's only theological seminary, the Bangor Theological Seminary, has trained and furnished much of the constructive leadership for these rural Maine churches, and Maine's foremost, if not only woman theologian, Mrs. Hilda Ives, experienced in the problems of the rural church, is now making a contribution in the field as a teacher of the Rural Church in Andover Theological Seminary in Newton, Massachusetts.

Introduction

Religion, as all other phases of the cultural life of a people, is influenced by the economy of that people. Attitudes of mind toward religion are conditioned by the breadth of vision achieved in the every day business of life, whatever that business may be. The influence of Maine's maritime history in the nineteenth century in all its cultural aspects would bear a much closer study than this brief introduction has attempted to achieve. Today it is only possible to measure that influence by a study of the records which represent its varied ramifications.

A wealth of material exists in Maine for the study of church history. Sources which remain to a large extent unpublished and unused are the manuscript records of local churches, town records, and the unpublished diaries and letters of early clergymen. Of these last, some have already been mentioned in this discussion. A recent publication of the University of Maine Studies, A Reference List of Manuscripts Relating to the History of Maine, Orono, University Press, 1938-39, 2 volumes, lists many of these diaries, and when the index to this work now in progress by the office of the Historical Records Survey in Maine is completed, this material may be found easily. Other diaries of Maine clergymen are listed by Harriette M. Forbes in her New England Diaries, Topsfield, (privately printed), 1923.

As for church and town records, the latter, when belonging to the period before the complete separation of church and state, contain a fund of interesting information. It is here the student will find rules affecting church worship, and customs followed in building a church and in administering its financial affairs. Here, too, local church controversies rise to heights which cannot be called sublime. It is this town record material which is coming to light through the routine work of the Historical Records Survey all over the country.

Many early church records are also extant and are of even greater interest and value. A great many of these, too, will be found listed in the Reference List of Manuscripts, just mentioned. Many hundreds of volumes must exist throughout the state which have not been listed.

Of the various denominational histories in print, the most satisfactory and complete is Calvin Clark's History of the Congregational Churches in Maine, 2 volumes, 1926, 1935, a work particularly strong in the use of contemporary sources. Files of the early religious magazines were systematically gone through by the author. He also had access to the extant records of the society which he used to good advantage. Mention in the footnotes has already been made of the Baptist and Methodist denominational histories.

One of several interesting sidelights left untouched in this study is the work of the Jesuit missions in the early colonial period of Maine History. The best account of this chapter of mission history is that made by Sister Mary Celeste Ledger, The Catholic Indian Missions in Maine, published by the Catholic University of America in 1929.

Introduction

No attempt has been made in the essay to date the founding of the first church in Maine, or even to state where it may have been. The question is a controversial one and space will not permit even a discussion of the information available on the subject. Various denominational and local histories contain information which can be pieced together by anyone wishing to know what the possibilities are for establishing priority of worship. It seems a certainty that no church records of so early a date will be found to prove the contention, whatever it may be.

These bibliographical suggestions would not be complete without mentioning the especially valuable early work of Rev. Jonathan Greenleaf, Sketches of the Ecclesiastical History of the State of Maine, Portsmouth, Harrison Gray, 1821. These are primarily sketches of various clergymen who during their pastorate were associated with Maine churches. These biographical sketches can be supplemented by similar material collected by William D. Williamson and published in the Collections Maine Historical Society, 2nd. series, volumes 5-7, 1892-1896. Sprague's Annals of the American Pulpit, New York, Robert Carter & Brothers, 1859, 7 volumes, also contain biographical sketches of many of Maine's early ministers.

To add further to the reader's information on denominational histories, the following works are suggested: Rev. Edward Ballard, "The Early History of the Protestant Episcopal Church, in the District of Maine", in the Collections Maine Historical Society, 1st ser. 6, 171-202, 1859; William Willis, "The Scotch Irish Immigration of Maine and Presbyterianism in New England", in the same volume, pp. 3-57; and Edward F. Dow, A Portrait of the Millennial Church of Shakers, University of Maine studies, Orono, 1932.

Those familiar with the colonial period of Maine history will miss the mention in this essay of the Church of England and the early religious activity of the few foreign groups in the state, the Huguenots, Scotch Irish, and Lutherans. These were small groups and their influence on Maine religious history even in the colonial period was negligible. After the absorption of outpost settlements in Maine by Massachusetts in 1692, or even earlier in 1652, the Church of England, such as it was, became overshadowed by Congregationalism, although neither church succeeded in morally regenerating the sparsely populated settlements in the Province of Maine.

In writing this introduction, Protestantism came more closely under the writer's scrutiny because it seems always in a state of flux, subject to the temperament of the people it serves. Had the introduction dealt with church statistics, it could have been shown that the increase of the French Canadian population in Maine in the nineteenth century coincided with the increase in the numerical strength of the Catholic Church. The development of Catholicism in Maine, the work of Bishop Cheverus of Boston in the beginning of the century, the French Catholic (Acadian) settlements in Madawaska, these are important in Maine church history and should be treated in a more extended historical essay. The early Catholic Indian missions which played such an active role in Maine colonial history, the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, the work of Elijah Kellogg later among the Passamaquoddy tribe, were omitted from the present sketch because their work did not bear directly on the intention of the writer in this introduction.

Introduction

These things just mentioned, with the doctrinal differences and circumstances surrounding the introduction of the various churches in Maine, the first church laws, the administration of the ministerial lot and fund, the schisms in the Congregational church which were so evident in town and church records after the Methodist and Baptist churches gained headway, early local regulations and customs, church architecture, and so forth, might well be treated in an extended essay on Maine religious history. There is a great fund of source material in Maine for such a study. As stated at the outset, it was not the intention of the writer to carry out so ambitious an undertaking. It has been the purpose of this introduction to show the implications of this current list of churches in Maine and to suggest bibliography for further study.

Other churches included on this list are those of one denomination, ministered to by a clergyman of another denomination, or those whose members worship together regardless of denomination and are loosely representative of more than one sect. All churches listed in this group of churches will be found on a denominational list. No church has been included on this list which is listed in the Larger Parish group found on page 82. Churches starred on this list were on a list of Federated Churches furnished by the Maine Council of Churches.

Miss Marion L. Ulmer
Office Secretary
178 Middle Street, Portland

The Maine Council of Churches comprising representatives of five Protestant denominations, the Congregational-Christians, Friends, Methodists, Unitarians, and Universalists, promotes a coordinating program designed to further constructive Christian activity in Maine communities. Originating in the so-called Interdenominational Commission organized by President William DeWitt Hyde of Bowdoin College and Dr. Alfred W. Anthony of Bates College in 1890, the Maine Council of Churches, as the Commission before it, embraces the work formerly carried on by the Maine State Sunday School Association, organized in 1869. In 1925, the organization became the Maine Council of Religious Education. At the present time the program of the Maine Council of Churches, organized in its present form in 1938, carries on the work of the Maine Council of Religious Education and the Interdenominational Commission of Maine. The Council is a member of the Federated Council of Churches of Christ in America and the International Council of Religious Education.

MISSION HOUSE

Superintendent
Rev. Neal D. Bousfield

Field Staff

Mrs. Gladys M. Young, Secretary	Miss Ethel L. Rand
Mrs. Alice H. Peasley	Mrs. Gladys M. Muir
Rev. Arthur H. Sargent	Mrs. Laura J. Varney, R. N.

This society, founded in 1905, carries on its activities by means of the Sunbeam, a substantially built mission boat. With headquarters at Bar Harbor, this boat plies along the coast, serving the social needs of hundreds of fishermen's families isolated in many small settlements on the islands and coast. The superintendent of the society states that religious services were conducted with some regularity the past year in the following settlements. Where no church appears in the settlement, services were held in a schoolhouse or in a private home.

INDEX TO CLERGY AND LAITY

AN INDEX TO CLERGY AND LAITY

(The following is a list of present day religious leaders in Maine whose names appear in this Directory. In entering these names the compilers were confused by the lack of uniformity in the form used by the various people who submitted lists of names. To have followed up the original lists for the purpose of supplying the first name and middle initial of each person entered would have added so greatly to the burden of compiling, it was thought inadvisable to do it the first year. The names have therefore been listed just as they were received by the compilers in the various sources tapped. In indexing these names, the first name and middle initial of each name has been used if that form appeared on any of the several lists in the Directory.)
